Q: Probabilistic Game involving Poisson Process A company has to choose a number of employees to run a factory. The company must choose its employees such that the number of employees is as even as possible. The probability that a company chooses its employees such that the total number of employees is even and the employees are equally spread across the positions is 2^{-n} . A company is awarded a prize for being first among all chosen companies. They will receive the prize if there are exactly n even numbers of employees. Compute the expected prize. Is this a discrete or continuous r.v.? A: Hint: n is the number of employees chosen λ is the Poisson rate Surface photothermographic silver halide materials and methods for forming images on them are known. The most common method of forming images on surface materials is by processing with heat and/or acid. Acid processing provides for a more compact image and higher image sensitivity, but requires a significant amount of control to avoid fog or other undesired effects. In contrast, heat processing is more forgiving in terms of processing chemistry, but does not provide the same level of compactness of image, particularly in the case of small silver halide grains. In order to achieve a compact image with heat processable silver halide, it is necessary to prepare silver halide grains with a very high surface area. However, a high surface area can cause unwanted effects. As the grains become more porous,
